ESH hires Taye Jones as part of DSHS summer intern program

In a first for Eastern State Hospital, ESH has utilized the Department of Social and Health Services' (DSHS) internship program and hired Taye Jones for the summer.

His first day was May 30.

The internship program was the brainchild of former DSHS Secretary Kevin Quigley not long after he was appointed to the position in 2013

by Gov. Jay Inslee.

Taye, who will be a senior at Washington State University in the fall, will serve in an administrative capacity where he will split duties between the Quality Management (QM) and Organizational Development departments.

In QM he will be responsible for database entry of seclusion and unusual occurrence reports (UOR) at the hospital. In Organizational Development he will assist staff in the creation of internal and wayfinding signage throughout the hospital.

Majoring in political science and sociology at the Pullman campus, Taye has worked as a resident assistant inputting data about homeless populations across Washington.

"It was a project about recidivism rates among homeless populations and how mental health plays a role in that dynamic," Taye said.

Upon graduation from WSU next year, Taye says he's considering pursuing a master's degree in public administration and or project management.

A graduate of Medical Lake High School in 2020, Taye is hardly a complete stranger to ESH as he is also the son of Clinical Nurse Specialist Elaine Alberti in the Educations Services department.

"She's worked here longer than I've been alive," Taye says. "But after getting hired and starting NEO (new employee orientation) it was then I realized how big the hospital is. I didn't even know where to park and I had to call her."

He's thankful for the opportunity to work at ESH.

"It's really special to me to have a chance to see the inner workings of places she has talked about for years," Taye says of his mother.
